Article 50 of the Constitution

Article 50 of the Constitution of the United States of America provides that the President shall have the right to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment. This power is one of the most important and most controversial powers of the Executive branch of the Government.

Under Article 50, the President has the authority to grant a full and complete pardon to any individual who has been convicted of a crime against the United States. This power is not subject to any legislative or judicial review.

The power of pardon is a discretionary power that is exercised by the President in his sole discretion. It is not subject to any legal constraints or limitations.

The power of pardon is a power that is unique to the President. It is a power that is not shared by any other branch of the Government. It is a power that is essential to the functioning of the Executive branch.

The power of pardon is a power that is essential to the functioning of the Executive branch.
